FOREWORD

When I first heard that some renegade employee had gotten their hands on the WWE Book of Rules and decided to share it with the world, I couldn't keep a slight smirk from crossing my face. That may come as a surprise considering I'm now a figure of authority (still can't get used to that word...) in WWE. But even though I've stepped into this new role, I'm still a Superstar at heart—and that's why I can appreciate this act of rebellion.

In a lot of ways, my in-ring career was built on breaking the so-called "rules" of WWE. I came into the company with a lot of eyes on me—many of them for the wrong reasons. There weren't any written directives stating you couldn't be a vegan if you worked for WWE. And I'm pretty sure I never saw a mandate that all Superstars own a television. But given the way some people talked to me in those days, you'd think such rules did exist. Some people referred to me as the "small-fry indie guy" or a "B-plus player." Michael Cole simplified things and just called me a nerd (Hey, pot? It's kettle. Got a message for you...). But I knew it was up to me to make them eventually call me "champion," and I was gonna break, ignore or rewrite any rule necessary to make that happen.

I actually have my own personal history with the WWE Book of Rules. I first encountered it the same night I made my Raw debut. I was wandering around backstage, anxious about making a major impact, and decided to stop by catering for a quick kale fix when I saw this rather unusual-looking folder on a table in the corner of the room. As far as official rule books go, it wasn't at all what you'd expect. Rough around the edges and totally unlike anything else I'd seen in the production office or anywhere else backstage. I couldn't take my eyes off of it (kinda sounds like me, doesn't it?!). I knew the rule book was important, and I looked forward to one day making my own additions to its pages. Ironically, I'd figuratively throw the whole thing right out the window later that same night when I joined the rest of Nexus to take over Raw. Obviously, we all make mistakes.

After I cooled down and settled into the company a little bit, I'd seek out the Book of Rules backstage and flip through it. I have a tremendous respect for the rich history of WWE, and I recognize the importance of having some guidelines here and there. There are plenty of rules I agreed with immediately. I won my first world championship thanks to the decree that you can cash in a Money in the Bank contract at ANY TIME (sorry, Show)! Plus, the somewhat loose dress code for Superstars allowed me to wear some pretty awesome robes, jackets and T-shirts on my way to the ring. Oh, and there's no edict against marrying a fellow Superstar, whether you're a Bella Twin or Billy and Chuck. But, obviously, the "rules"—or rather, the people in charge of enforcing them—eventually became a huge obstacle in my career. That's when I started to break the ones I didn't agree with and, in some cases, make my own.

Once The Authority started screwing me out of the WWE Championship any time I got near it, the Book of Rules became my new best friend. Sometimes I would bring it out just to throw in their face whenever I felt they were being hypocrites going against the framing document of their own company. Other times I would use it to mess with them, either by defacing memos, rewriting rules behind their backs or by tearing out any ridiculous additions as soon as they'd make them (Hint: You won't find a rule in here that says "B-plus players cannot be WWE champion").

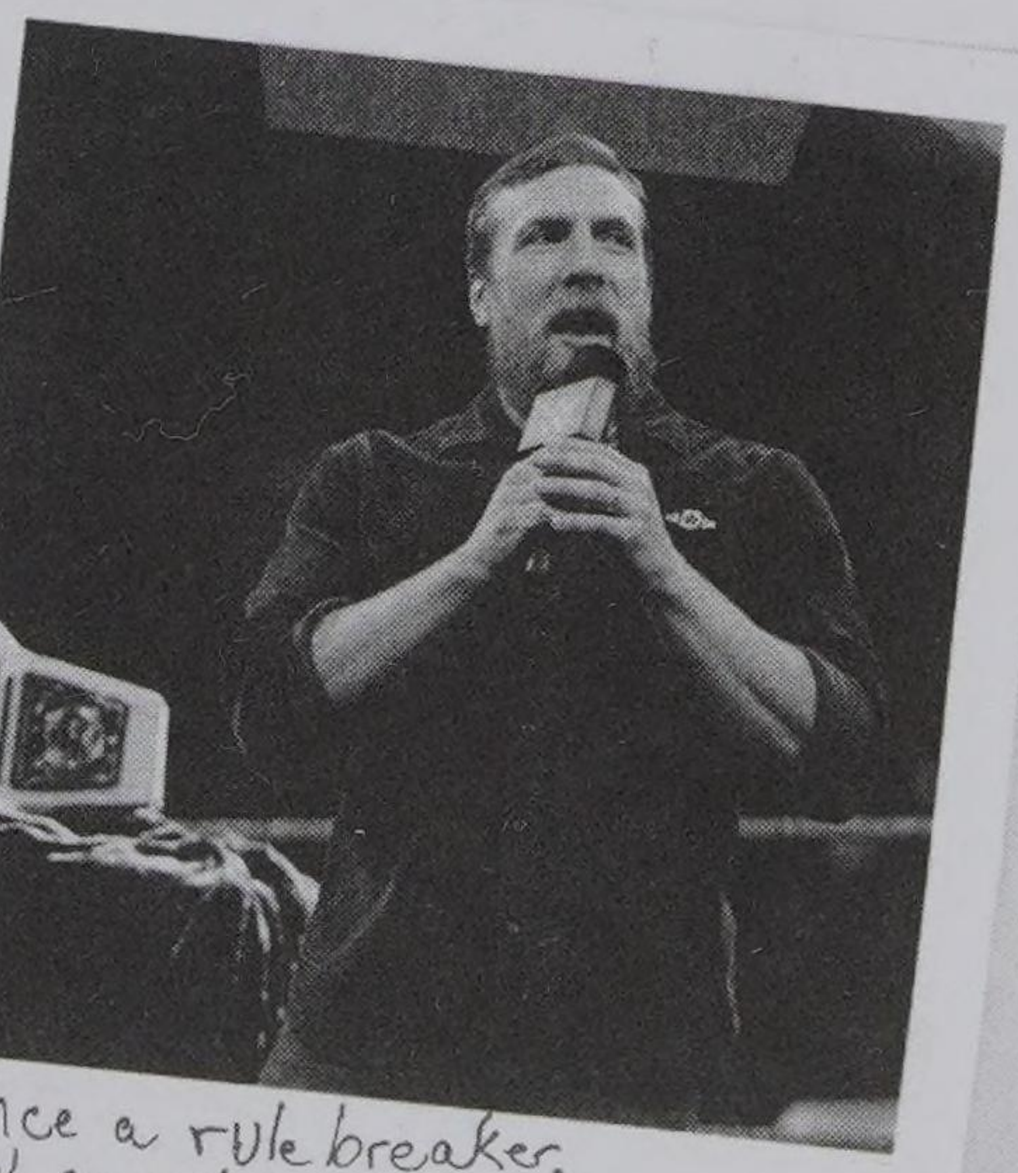

My favorite way to use the Book of Rules during this time, though, was as inspiration. I would look at all the ways someone like Stone Cold Steve Austin would turn these rules upside down in retaliation against everything Mr. McMahon tried to put him through, and I related completely. I didn't drive a beer truck into the arena and hose everyone down, but I think I got under Triple H's skin just as much when I led members of the WWE Universe into the ring for our "Occupy Raw" movement. Then I would come to a page and see a rule written by Mick Foley, and I'd think about how he became champion despite being a far cry from the "corporate-looking" Superstar they've always preferred. That solidified my decision to let my beard and my hair grow even wilder in my uphill battles against The Authority. I came to learn which rules would help me and which ones I should go ahead and ignore, and I had history on my side to back it all up. And look how it worked out! I went on to shatter the glass ceiling at WrestleMania 30, winning the WWE World Heavyweight Championship. I became the general manager of Smackdown. And I don't think I could've done those things had I not interpreted this Book of Rules for myself, rather than sheepishly obeying it (I'm not a sheep, I'm a goat!).

I think the main thing I've taken away from my experience with the WWE Book of Rules is that, in WWE, as in life, sometimes you have to make your own law. Write your own code, and stand by it. So, as a former champion, as a general manager and the right-hand man of Shane McMahon, do I support the decision of a WWE employee to steal and distribute this extremely confidential Book of Rules, essentially sticking it to the brass at Titan Tower?

I've got three words for you:

YES! YES! YES!

Once a rule breaker,

A NOTE from the EDITOR:

Dear Reader,

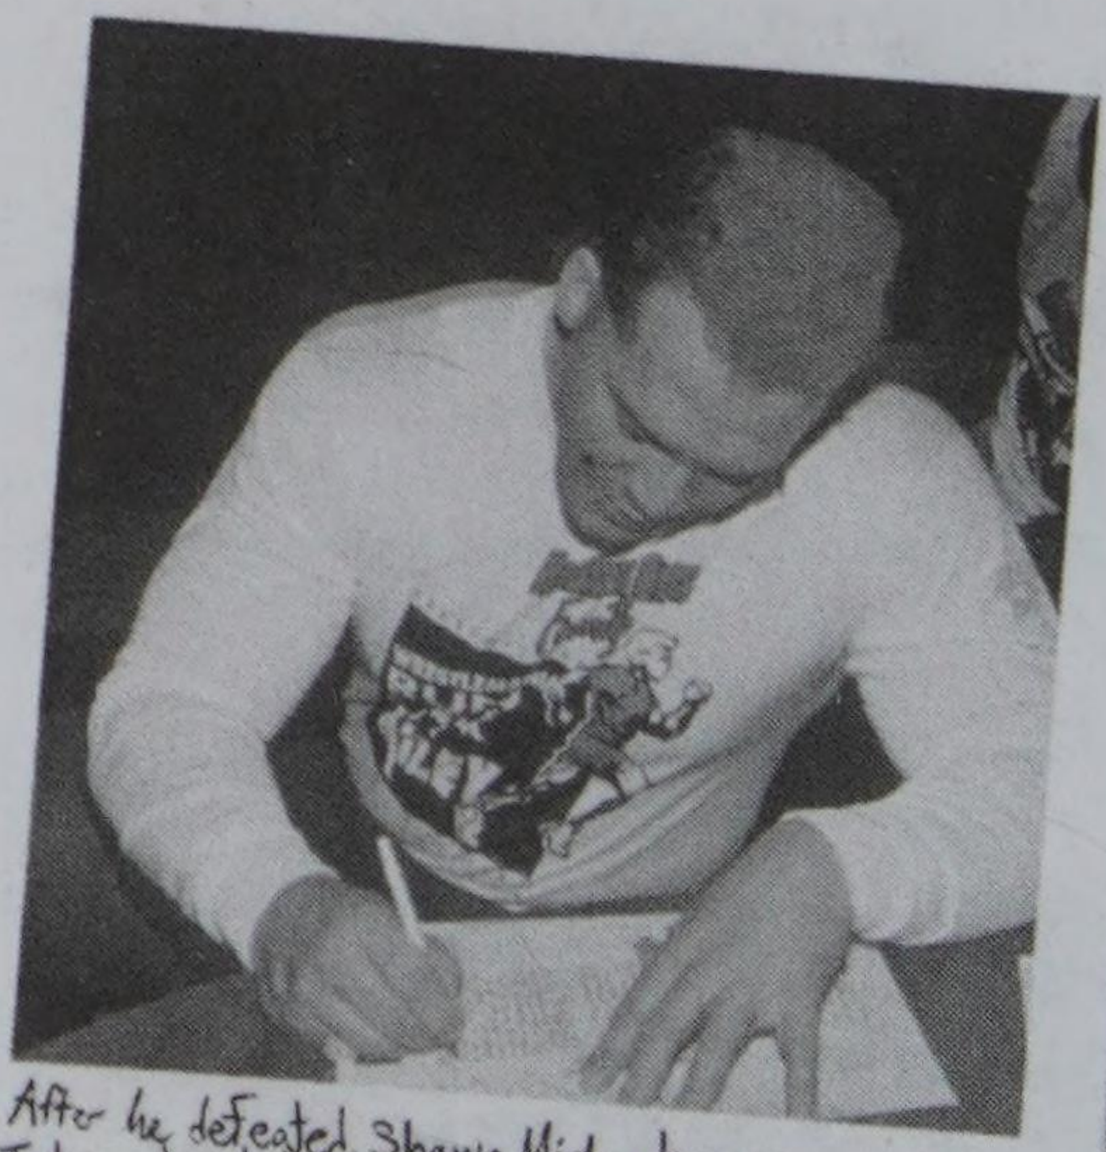

What you're about to read—or rather, experience—is a living, breathing document that has been written, revised, reinterpreted and regretted throughout WWE history. Despite hearing rumblings about this rule book since my very first day with the company, I always figured it was merely a myth. My assumption for years was that this fabled "infinitely expanding book of rules" was just part of locker room lore, like the stories of Crash Holly beating Mark Henry in an arm wrestling match or that rumor about Boogeyman being the result of a Papa Shango hex gone wrong.

Then I found it.

It was SummerSlam weekend in Brooklyn, and I had been assigned to interview some of the Superstars for an upcoming project. As I was walking by a production truck on my way out of the Barclays Center, I nearly tripped over something lying on the asphalt. I looked down to see a timeworn manilla folder bursting at all edges with content, pages and pages and pages spilling out from the sides. At first I thought it was an early draft of another Mick Foley manuscript or possibly the archive of an underground WWE fanzine. But as I carefully gathered the scattered pages, I began to realize the truth.

It wasn't just a folder of documents—it looked like an artifact that had survived chaos, calamity and the Corporation. Maybe it had been there when Ricky "The Dragon" Steamboat beat Macho Man Randy Savage for the Intercontinental Championship at WrestleMania III. It's entirely possible it had been run over by a beer truck, a zamboni, a monster truck or maybe all three during the rebellious reign of "Stone Cold"Steve Austin. It was probably there when Brock Lesnar conquered Undertaker's streak at WrestleMania 30, as the whole folder is marked with faded soda stains that look like they came from a classic spit take. I knew exactly what I was holding in my hands. This was the WWE Book of Rules.

I couldn't stop looking at it. I am, after-all, a lifelong WWE fan who landed a dream job the day I was hired as an editor with the company. The 12-year-old kid in me (who's still rocking a Mankind mask and a J.O.B. Squad T-shirt) was begging me to just crack it open and see what this continuously growing WWE time capsule, essentially, had inside. So, I did. And once I started flipping through everything, well, let's just say I had a hard time not

After he defeated Shawn Michaels in an Intercontinental Championship match at WrestleMania IX, Tatanka tried to change the rule stipulating that titles don't change hands in the event of a win by countout. He was unsuccessful.

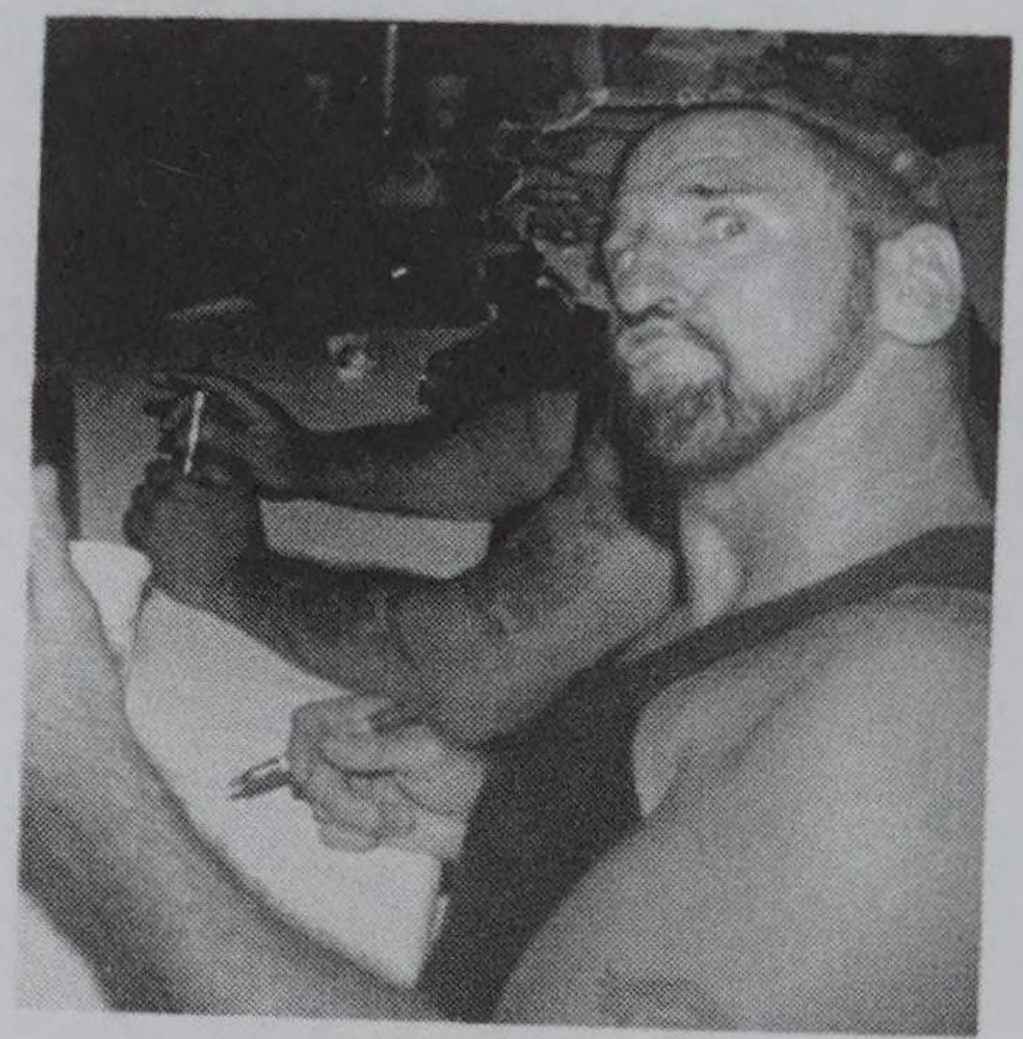

As WWE has evolved, so have its rules.
For example, maybe one day there will be a rule against conspiring with those in charge in order to win a championship.
Of course, the Authority does have a final say in which rules are adopted.

breaking out into a one-man "THIS IS AWESOME" chant in that parking lot.

The WWE Book of Rules is unlike any other collection of regulations you might see in a sports organization, which is only natural, as professional wrestling within WWE is unlike any sport anywhere in the world. The rules are not neatly typed, bound and coated in a swank leather cover. Many are scrawled on scrap paper, some are penned on paper towels, pieces of stationery, sticky notes and in one case, a police report.

Of course, this chaotic incarnation is not how this rule book was originally intended to come together. In the earliest days of WWE, the dos and don'ts were mostly limited to the action in the ring, with simple standards and practices for traditional matches.

In 1989, The Bushwhackers submitted a rule requiring all Superstars march to the ring while moving their arms up and down as though they're climbing a ladder. They were the only ones who chose to follow it.

Back in the days of the territories, the rule book supposedly traveled with the Superstars from town to town. Riding shotgun with the men who would define the business, it wound its way through the backroads of America, from Amarillo to Portland, from dusty barn to smoky sportatorium. Along the way, new rules were added, old ones rewritten and the unspoken laws of the business began to take shape. Rules were officialized on typewriters and the pages were presented to the Superstars of the past to be memorized and, hopefully, obeyed. But inevitably, those rules were bent and broken by brazen competitors in no time, leading to numerous new rules being created for not just the squared circle, but for all walks of life as a WWE Superstar.

In the early days of the business, the New York territory was overseen by Vince McMahon Sr., who had inherited the World Wide Wrestling Federation from his own father, Jess McMahon. Under McMahon Sr., the business as we know it today began to take shape, with consummate showmen like "Gorgeous" George, "Nature Boy" Buddy Rogers and the mighty Bruno Sammartino dominating both the ring and the airwaves. These were the prototypical Superstars, the larger-than-life personas that set the tone for the rulers of the ring we watch today. And, under McMahon's watchful eye, the rule book continued to expand.

When Vince's son, Vincent Kennedy McMahon, began his consolidation of the business, vacuuming up the territories and bringing them under the umbrella of what would become WWE, the book came with him and underwent its own consolidation. Mr. McMahon's transformation of WWE revolutionized the business, and the rules soon followed suit. Soon, the apparel of the Superstars became an area of concern for those in charge, with the vibrant, sometimes overly scanty, very often outlandish outfits requiring new rules be written. Then the pageantry of Superstar entrances blossomed, leading to new standards being set for the right and wrong ways of going to and from the ring. And then came the Attitude Era, where the rule book may as well have been thrown out the window. In some ways, it was. But the interested parties at Titan Tower tried their best to keep things under control by vastly expanding the previously sparse directives for special stipulation matches and the manner in which Superstars conduct themselves. Unsurprisingly, the rich history and unpredictable nature of this company birthed the monstrous manilla folder of haphazard documents now considered the official WWE Book of Rules—a reference accessible by any Superstar and amended at will as circumstances required.

Just like any verbal decree or proclamation that takes place on WWE television, essentially none of these rules go unchallenged. No matter how old or new a rule is, there are always those who strongly object. It doesn't matter if it came from a Superstar or the Chairman himself—someone always has something to say in response, and they'll gladly deface the original rule to make their message known.

And because I simply couldn't keep this incredible secret to myself, I decided to go rogue and share it with the world. With the overflowing folder in hand, I ran to the nearest office supply store to scan as many copies as I could. Yeah, it was quite a task. A costly one, too (everybody does indeed have a price, Mr. DiBiase). So, I didn't quite get everything, but this is at least a vast representation of the mayhem that is this rule book. And as you'll see, anything can happen in WWE—even if the rules say otherwise.

Will I lose my job over this?
Probably.

Will it have been worth it?
See for yourself.

RULES OF THE RING

The middle of the arena is the center of the WWE Universe, which is why the commandments for competition had to be set early on. But even the oldest, most sacred rules are routinely ignored.

WHAT TO WEAR

While many Superstars have gone the route of traditional trunks, others have over-accessorized or, in some cases, underdressed in alarming fashion. Naturally, codes for dress became essential.

ENTRANCES AND EXITS

The seemingly simple process of traveling to and from a match has proven to be anything but in WWE. These regulations highlight the right and wrong ways to arrive and depart.

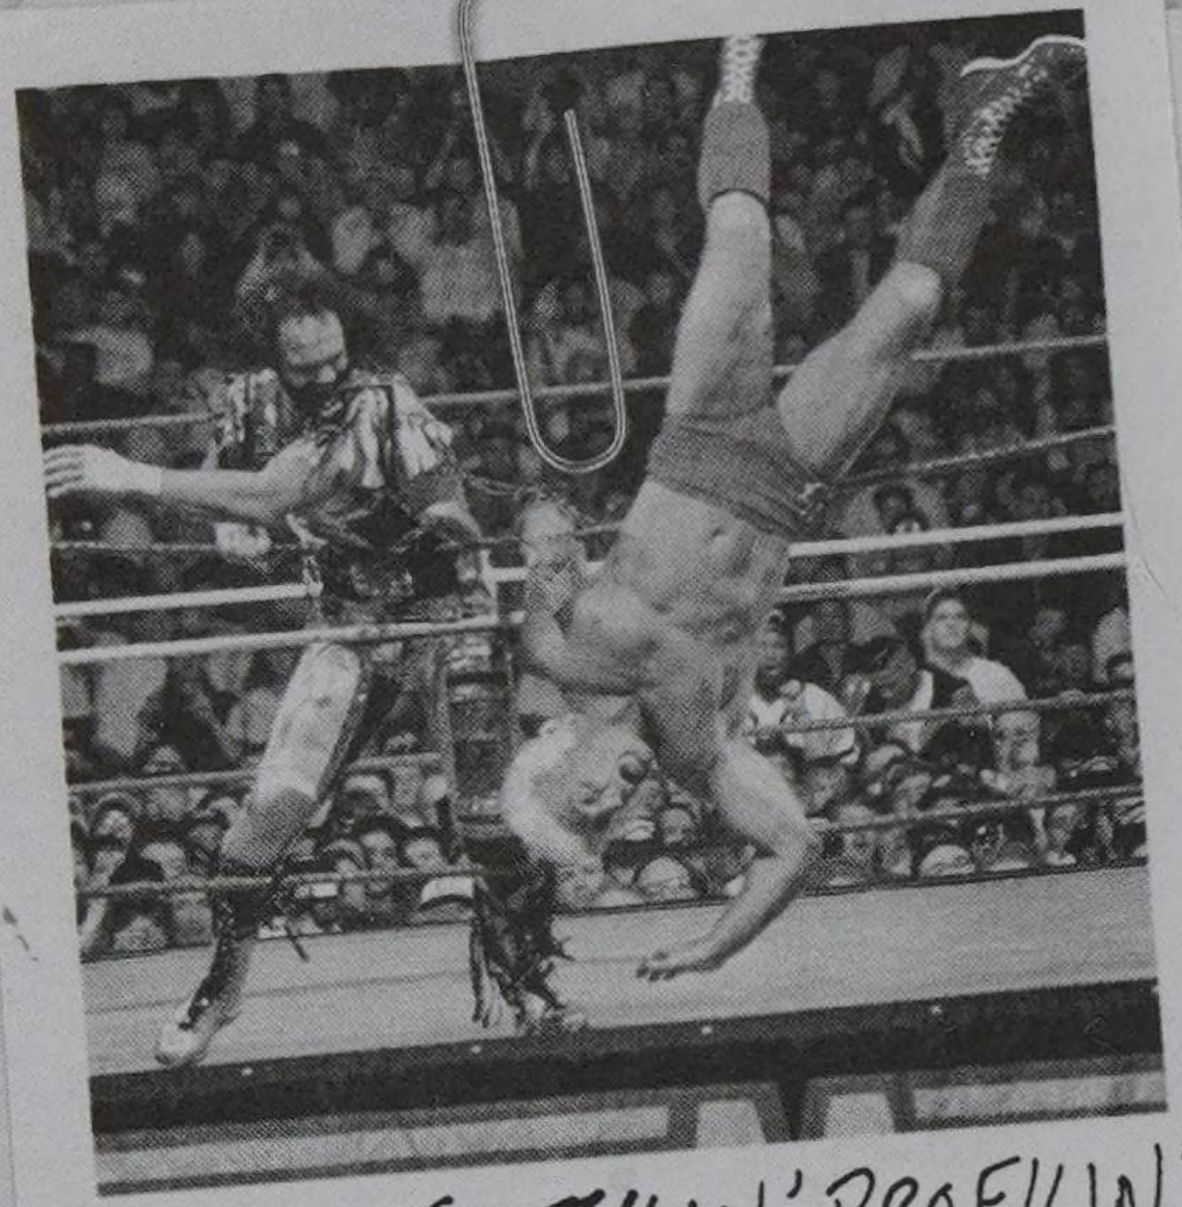

STIPULATION MATCHES

When a standard contest could no longer settle the score, the WWE brass decided to allow some rules to be set aside for special occasions. These are their attempts to control the chaos.

SUPERSTAR CONDUCT

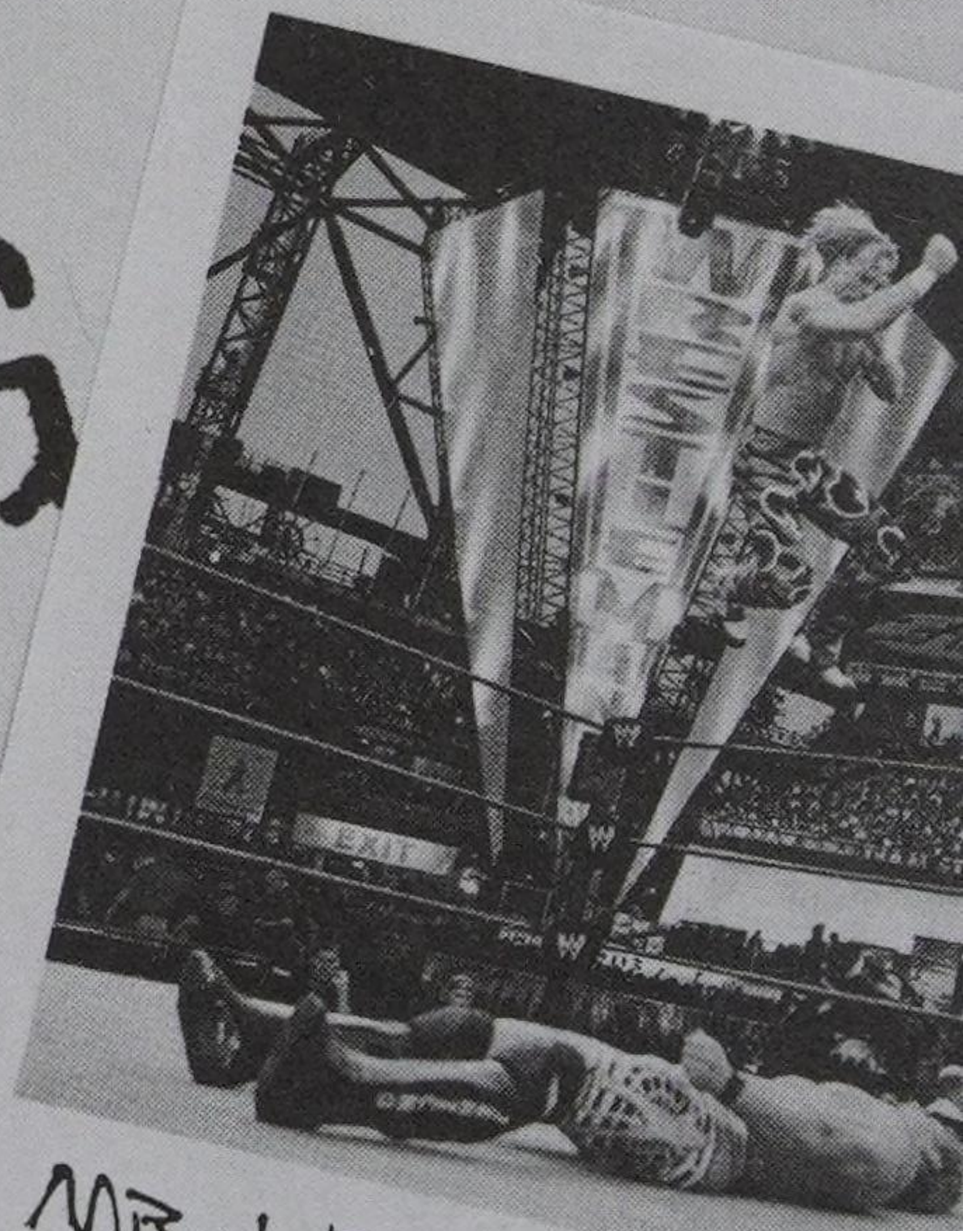

The ideal WWE Superstar is not only a stellar athlete; they're a stand-up citizen and consummate professional. But as these rules show, many Superstars break the mold (among other things)

The earliest decrees in WWE history are found within the regulations governing competition. Of course, as countless Superstars have demonstrated, these rules are also the most unabashedly broken.

Tag Team Matches

Best match for a main event, playa!

A standard tag team contest begins with one member of each team in the ring. The partners of each starting Superstar must wait on a designated area of the ring apron until they are tagged in.

While on the apron, a superstar cannot roam freely in order to reach their partner for a tag. They must hold onto the tag rope attached to the turnbuckle in order for a tag to count.

That plenty time to tell you - WWE

After a tag occurs the participants have a five count to make the switch, before they are disqualified.

The legal Superstar is the one who is currently tagged into the match. In moments of perilous pins and submissions, the legal Superstar may be rescued by their partner, but only one save is permitted for each team.

If the referee catches an illegal participant striking a legal participant, he can call for a disqualification.

The high-five style is the most typical type of tag, but it is not required. "Blind tags," which are often a surprise slap on the back, are fair game.

DO NOT allow Big Show to do this. His hands are the size of FRYING PANS!

Tornado Clause

For certain specialty matches, the tag team championships can be defended with tornado tag rules. Originally known as a Texas Tornado match, this stipulation allows for all members of both teams to be in the ring at all times without tagging.

NOTE: EVEN IF YOU ARE MIKE TYSON, YOU SHOULD READ THIS...

Hello! If you're reading this, that means you've recently been hired as a WWE official (or you're serving as a special guest referee). While you've likely been briefed on what to expect when you're officiating, I'm here to help you prepare for some of the stuff only a former ref would know to look out for. So before you don the stripes, I suggest you consult the following list of dos and don'ts:

DO

-Recover as quickly as you can if inadvertently knocked down.
-Have eyes in the back of your head.
-Check Tajiri's mouth for illegal green mist.
-Enforce the rules no matter how intimidating the competitors are.
-Make sure you have backup if breaking up a brawl.

DON'T

-Get distracted by managers/valets/tag partners.
-Allow William Regal to begin a match without patting him down first.
-Trade referee outfits with Shawn Michaels.

-Assume the correct Bella Twin is in the ring.

-Ask Cena if he gives up. (WASTE OF TIME)

Dear Superstars,

During competition, please do your best to remain inside the ring.

If you find yourself outside of the ring, either of your own volition or because you were unceremoniously tossed over the ropes, please refrain from searching beneath the ring apron for tools, ladders, tables or other "equalizers" to bring back into the ring with you. or leprechauns!!!

Obviously because the above requests are flouted so repeatedly, we ask that IF you are going to search beneath the ring apron that you PLEASE return it back to its proper position. The crew spends a lot of time making the ring look spectacular for television and live-audiences alike. No one wants to see a ring apron tossed haphazardly into the competition area.

On behalf of all WWE officials, I am writing you in hopes of doing away with the 24/7 rule for the Hardcore Championship. While we understand the excitement this stipulation adds, we are finding ourselves completely exhausted trying to keep up with these on-the-spot matches. Plus, this stip has allowed for many non-Superstars to become champions, some of whom are completely unfit for WWE. Below is a list of just some of the recent Hardcore Champions:

- A popcorn vendor at MSG
- Steve Blackman's grandmother
- Ken, manager of a Chicago Holiday Inn
- A 9 year-old boy wearing an Undertaker T-shirt

We hope you will understand our concerns and abolish this rule.

Dear Mr. McMahon,

We have reviewed your claim thoroughly and are afraid there is no clause in your insurance policy that covers your Corvette being filled with cement. Particularly given that you were parked so close to that construction zone. If anything, we could try to classify this incident as an act of God, but as far as we can tell, Stone Cold Steve Austin isn't God—he's just very good at being bad.

I'M NOT that big, brudda

While the fact that we must send this memo again is disturbing in and of itself, there have been a number of complaints, and we must therefore address the elephant in the room.

Please refrain from purposefully flatulating upon one another during a match. The WWE ring is a place to prove one's athletic and strategic prowess—not to expel your intestinal gas in the hopes that it will debilitate your opponent. While it is difficult to prove unequivocally who "dealt it," during a match, we can all certainly smell it—and there will be repercussions if these incidents continue to be overt.

Additionally, while it may prove popular with the crowd, it is unbecoming for a Superstar to rub, mash, press or shake their buttocks on, against or into the face(s) of anyone in the ring*—particularly when they are in a prone/vulnerable state.

This is our fourth specific mention of this topic. We hope it will be our last... I did it for The Rock

SHOULDA STAYED IN THE CAR AT A GOTHIC HOUSE

...I am inclined to believe Mr. Orton because he was covered in bits of glass with small lacerations consistent with a scene transition and it's doubtful he dove through the window of his own. That would be stupid. When I arrived on the scene, myself and my partner found Mr. H assaulting Mr. Orton. We attempted to restrain Mr. H, but he is, I'll admit, a big dude. We eventually cuffed Mr. H and booked him. Upon further questioning, Mr. Orton revealed he had been antagonizing Mr. H, a former work colleague, before the incident happened, but he admits he felt he was doing so from the safety of his own home and had assumed Mr. H was at an arena many miles away for a live television taping. After handcuffing Mr. H, officers assessed damages done to Mr. Orton and his property. Along with physical abrasions, Mr. Orton also claims to have experienced emotional trauma. Mr. Orton asked us to witness the damages to his home as a result of the fight, but we cannot confirm how much, if any, of this damage was caused by the brawl itself. It looks like the kind of guy who might punch a hole in his own wall, so there's no way to know what damages might have already occurred before Mr. H arrived.

DAMAGES

Wall art/family photos = $35
Tri-fold door, kicked in = $165

Shattered large window sash = $765

Dear Superstars,

Winning the Money in the Bank contract guarantees you the opportunity to challenge for the WWE World Heavyweight Championship at any time. It does not, however, grant you immunity with regard to using the briefcase that contains the contract as a weapon. Assaulting anyone with the briefcase within the confines of a match is grounds for disqualification.

As a side note, you technically don't need to carry the briefcase around. The contract is inside. It's a piece of paper. A briefcase is not a contract.

Attention All Superstars,

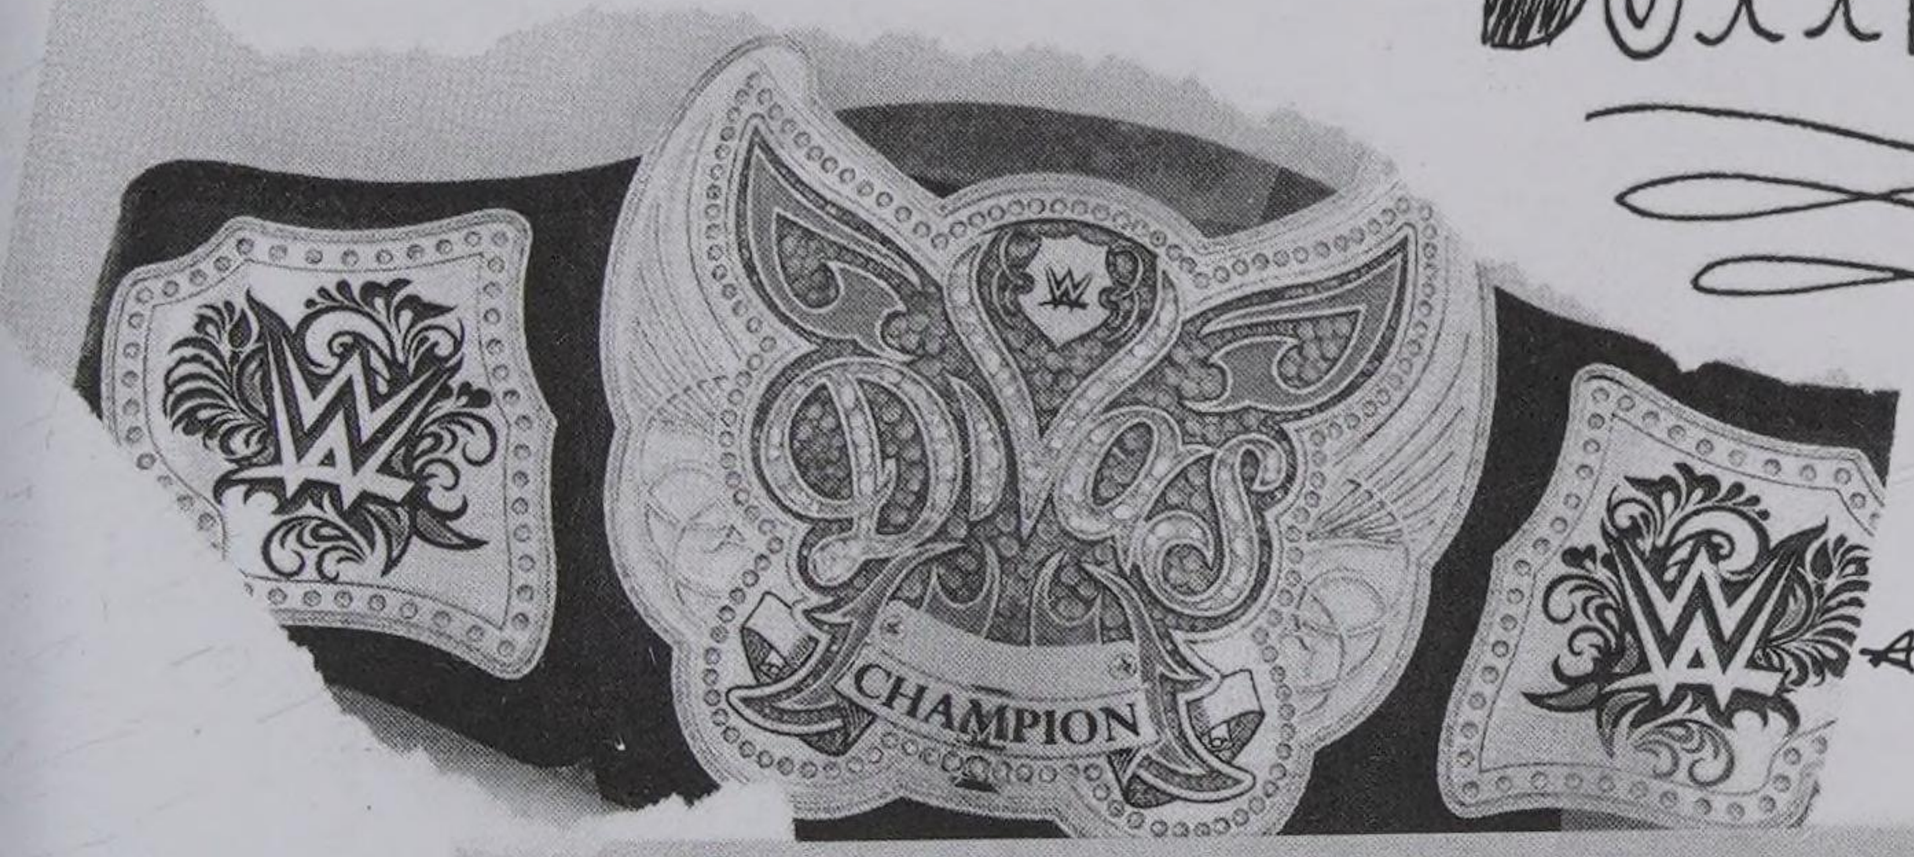

As many of you may know, there is a revolution happening with not just the women in WWE, but in all sports. And because the women of WWE are just as valuable and exciting as the men, I would lik to formally declare that going forward, all WWE talent will now be referred to as Superstars. The te "Diva" is officially retired. Unless referring to The Miz

Subsequently, the women's triple threat match tonight will be for the brand new WWE Women's Championship.

On any given night, the actions, appearances and assertions of WWE Superstars may seem to suggest that the ring is a lawless land. But that's not the case (just ask the refs!). In fact, throughout its storied history, the regulations of WWE have only expanded in an effort to keep the company from devolving into chaos. Every written rule, be it formally typed by a corporate official or hastily scribbled by a roguish Superstar, has been kept and concealed in a humble legal binder. The lineage of this dossier is lengthier than that of the WWE Championship, having passed through the hands of legends throughout all of sports-entertainment history. But for myriad reasons, its contents have been kept completely confidential to anyone outside the walls of WWE. Until now...
